The Prospect of Death, Chapter 1

This is chapter one of my story!!! I'm so excited to hear what you think of it. Just wait til you read chapter 2...

The bitter wind gusted through the tiny town, rattling the glass windowpanes and pushing through creaky wooden walls.

"There's a stranger in town," said the Sheriff, leaning back on the legs of his chair. He swallowed the rest of his beer in one gulp and slammed the glass on the table.

"Do you think he can fix our problem?" Gerard Montmorency asked. He twisted his hat nervously in his coal-stained hands, dirtying the brim.

"Doubtful," the Sheriff replied. "Some outta town city slicker upstart thinks he's gonna find emeralds here, he's crazy."

"The legends- " Gerard started.

"The legends are nonsense, and you should know better," the Sheriff stated. He let the chair legs slam down on the floor and leaned over the table, folding his arms.

"I wanna see this town prosper just as much as you do," the Sheriff said. "But I'm not about to let some fool from the big city tell us where to search for our life's earnings."

"Will you give him a chance?" Thomas London spoke up from the corner of the Sheriff's office, his voice emerging from a dark cloud of tobacco smoke. "He might be our last hope at saving this place."

"Nonsense," the Sheriff spat. "Emeralds? In the Yukon? Not likely."

"You'll eat your words, Sheriff," Gerard said. "Crazier things have happened." He tapped his hat on the side of his leg.

The Sheriff leaned back in the chair again and lit up his pipe, blowing smoke at the ceiling in an exasperated manner.

"He gets a fortnight to prove his green gee-gaws theory," he said, "and then Bertram Fancy-pants Fitzgerald De Vere is outa here."

Part 1 of my detective/mystery story:
<https://diebarry.tumblr.com/post/94549422598/i>

TM @diebarry

I.

The girl disappeared on Friday night. One minute she was standing in front of the Tim Hortons crying into her cell phone. The next minute, she had all but vanished. No one knew what had happened or why she was gone. Things like this didn't happen. Not in their town. Their town was nice, sleepy. It was full of smiling people and white fences. Girls didn't disappear.

But this one had.

Jenny was an average girl. She had average brown hair, average brown eyes, an average build and an average height. She got average grades and played third clarinet in the band and she was the manager of the girls' volleyball team. She might have had a boyfriend or a girlfriend or she might have been single. But if she was in a relationship, her significant other would have also been average. She most likely had a normal family; one brother, one sister, two parents. She definitely existed before she disappeared. But it seemed that she existed more to other people after she was gone.

And everyone was frantically trying to find her.

Especially a young man named Detective Chad.

Detective Chad used to be an orphan. Which means he had some sort of tragic back story he never divulged to anyone. This was also why he never used his last name. Because it wasn't his last name.

His partner, Detective O'Malley was not often amused by Detective Chad.

But now that Jenny was gone they had to stop their witty banter and get to work. So they could find her before something even worse than disappearing happened. Or so they could at least find out what had happened. And who had done it.

There were no leads. There were no clues. There were no suspects.

It seemed that Detective Chad would be facing his toughest case yet.

The Prospect of Death, Chapter 2

"Stop it!" Cordelia Charlotte Montmorency giggled, pushing her friend Geraldine by the arm. She tossed her brunette curls over her shoulder. "I'm not in love with him!"

"Really..." Geraldine Genevieve Seymour replied. "Because you were most flushed and flirtatious in your conversation with the general store boy earlier today." She batted her long eyelashes in imitation of Cordelia's behaviour.

"He's just the cutest thing around here," Cordelia said, wringing out her dishtowel. She lifted the stack of clean plates into the cupboard of her father's kitchen. "You can't blame me for searching out the only handsome man available."

Cordelia and Geraldine had been bosom friends since birth. Their mothers died in a terrible flu epidemic when they were both infants, leaving two clueless coal miner fathers to raise two pretty baby girls. Naturally, they were thrown together and bonded fast- a truer, more loyal pair of friends could not be found within three territories.

"Is the pie ready?" Geraldine asked, peeking into the oven.

"Almost," replied Cordelia. She peered into the looking glass above the kitchen sink and adjusted her hair. She pinned her beautiful brown curls, one by one, in an elegant knot above her alabaster brow.

"You didn't even check," Geraldine said, laughing. She opened the iron door and carefully retrieved the crispy beef pie with a thick cloth, setting it on top of the stove.

A heavy knock sounded on the kitchen door.

"That must be Father," Cordelia said, tearing her eyes away from her reflection. She glided over to the door, peered through the peephole, and opened it with great enthusiasm.

Gerard Montmorency smiled wearily at the sight of his doll of a daughter.

"Cordelia," he sighed. "My dear, is the dinner prepared?" Gerard entered, shutting the door behind him, and shrugged off his coat. He hung it with care over the coat stand next to the door.

"Yes, Geraldine and I were just finishing it!" Cordelia said excitedly. "Your favourite."

"I hope you've made enough for our guest," Gerard said, pulling off his boots.

"Guest?" Cordelia asked. "Have you invited a new suitor for me?" Her eyes twinkled mischievously, and she played with a curl dangling over her forehead.

"Not every gentleman to enter this town is seeking your hand, despite what you may think," Gerard sighed. "He's an entrepreneur from the city with ideas for saving the town."

"How tedious," Cordelia joked. "All this work for nothing!" She took the clean plates from the cupboard and began to set the dinner table.

"He'll be here in a few minutes, he had some business with the sheriff," Gerard stated.

"The Sheriff is such an odious man," said Geraldine, bringing the beef pie to the table. She sliced it expertly with a knife and began to serve portions. "I always feel as if I'm doing something wrong in his lawful presence."

The three sat down to the table, Cordelia poured wine, and they were just about to begin their meal when a sharp rap sounded on the kitchen door. Cordelia rose to answer the guest, but Gerard held up his hand. He went over to the door and opened it, revealing the mysterious and debonair Bertram Fitzgerald de Vere.

Bertram Fitzgerald de Vire was tall, strong, and handsome, and walked with confidence into the kitchen and Geraldine's heart.

The dinner was a blur to Geraldine and Bertram, lost in each other's kind eyes. Bertram smiled, Geraldine laughed shyly, wine was poured, and they fell more and more deeply into everlasting love.

Cordelia twisted her curls and batted her eyelashes to no avail. The elusive Bertram had eyes only for Geraldine, and all intended talk of saving the town by mining for emeralds went out of his head the moment he saw her amethyst eyes.

The Prospect of Death, Chapter 3

A fortnight later...

The sun was setting over the mountains, the air turning frigid. Ice had formed on the ground already, although it was only September.

The town was afire with news of Bertram Fitzgerald de Vere's search for emeralds in the empty coal mines, and his search for love. The former quest was as of yet unfulfilled. The latter-

"I'll see you tomorrow?" Bertram bent over Geraldine's hand, raising it to his lips.

Geraldine blushed deeply. "Tomorrow," she promised.

Bertram donned his hat and left the house, turning his collar against the bitter wind. He walked briskly down the wide street, towards the Sheriff's office.

In the Seymour house, Geraldine lay back on her sofa and sighed. Bertram was perfect. Never had a love like hers and Bertram's existed in the history of mankind. She smiled to herself, glancing at the diamond ring on her finger. His proposal had been perfect.

An hour previous...

"Geraldine- " he began, holding her hand. He cleared his throat and knelt down.

"I came to this town searching for the greatest treasure in the world, expecting to find a trove of emeralds in your father's mine. Little did I know I would discover something- someone- even more precious."

Geraldine breathed deeply, her eyes tearing up.

"I have never met a woman so selfless, beautiful, generous, kind-hearted, honest, or wonderful as you," he said in earnest.

"I cannot dream of a life without you. The world was imperfect, life half-lived. Sunsets were but stains from God's paintbrush before I met you. How did water flow, the wind blow over the plains, the grass grow from the ground? What is life without your beauty, your smile, your eyes, your voice?"

"I thought I had seen perfection in the Grand Canyon or these mountains, but neither can compare to the exquisite composition of your soul. Jewels, money, riches, wine- none can compare to the fullness of life you offer me. I cannot breathe without you, take away oxygen and I will survive on your smile. Take away food and your eyes will sustain me. Take away water and your voice- your soul- quenches my thirst."

"It is not enough to say that I love you. I am not enough for your perfection. I will never be worthy of your eternal splendour. But I can offer you the entirety of my imperfect soul- a soul which will be steadfast to you forever, to the ends of time."

Bertram took Geraldine's other pale hand in his own.

"Will you do me the honour of becoming my wife?"

The Prospect of Death, Chapter 4

Geraldine sat up with purpose. Cordelia must be confided in. Her father was responsible for her introduction to Bertram, anyway.

She hurriedly put on her coat and hat, and left the house. It was approaching dark, but the sun could still be seen over the farthest mountain peak.

Cordelia lived nearby in their small village, and after summoning her dearest friend, Geraldine led her up the mountain to their secret meeting place.

The wind was strong, gusting over the cliff and pulling snow in every direction.

"Cordelia..." Geraldine began anxiously. "We are the most faithful friends, I know you would never betray me."

"What ever is the matter?" Cordelia asked. "And why did we need to leave town to speak of it?"

"Cordelia..." Geraldine did not know how to begin. "I need you to keep a secret for me."

"Anything," said Cordelia. "I cross my heart."

"My father wouldn't approve..." Geraldine said. "But Bertram and I are engaged to be married."

Time stood still. Cordelia stared out over the cliff, her eyes fixed on the frozen river below.

"Cordelia?" Geraldine asked nervously. She took a step closer to her dear friend.

"Cordelia?" Geraldine asked again. She laid her hand on Cordelia's fair arm.

In a sudden moment, Cordelia spun around and slapped Geraldine across the face, sending her whirling into the snowbank.

"You knew I was in love with him!" screamed Cordelia. "You knew, and you still pursued him!" She snatched at Geraldine's cloak, pulling her up off the ground. They were face to face.

"I- I didn't know- you never said anything," Geraldine stammered. "You never said-"

"How could you?" screamed Cordelia. She pushed Geraldine backwards, towards the cliff face. "Friends tell each other everything! You lied to me!"

"I didn't!" Geraldine begged. She tried to regain her balance on the slippery slope.

"You don't deserve him!" Cordelia shrieked. "Bertram is MINE!" She pushed Geraldine viciously.

Geraldine's feet slid on the ice, she grasped at the ground, trying to find purchase on the slippery slope.

@AnneWith_An_E: This chapter focuses heavily on betrayal.
